FOREWORD

When I came to Texas I had seen the work of only one member of this group and felt that, however much I was impressed, it was perhaps only a unique phenomenon. Later, however, when I had the opportunity to see more than a thousand paintings by Texas artists in competition for the Texas Centennial Art Exhibition I was convinced that Texas had many young artists who were doing fine work of a distinctive and regional quality. Furthermore, it appears that Dallas is the strongest center of this distinctive work and the eleven painters and two sculptors in this group from Dallas represent one of the most significant yet natural regional developments in contemporary American painting. This praise may sound extravagant but it is not intended so, for it must be admitted that certain of these artists have faults; some of them think better than they paint and some permit too great influence from unrelated sources. But the important thing is that they are all thinking as well as working. Trained in impressionism, each of these artists has progressed thoughtfully through the stimulation of post-impressionism and emerged into an original and satisfactory expression of their own locality and their own natures. If the work of this group bears a superficial resemblance to the work of certain well-known contemporary American painters elsewhere it is because these artists have chosen subjects with which they are familiar rather than following any set style of American genre. The sharp edges and clarity of tone in their work has been generated more by the atmosphere and appearance of the Texas landscape than by any admiration for the primitives. It is to be hoped that the influence of this group will continue to exert itself over this region and will in due time be recognized in other parts of America.
